Among the Books

"The Land and the Book."

By W. M. Thomson, D. D. Harper & Bros., New York and London. $2.49 net. Two volumes.

These books are properly described as being made up of a series of biblical illustrations drawn from the manners and customs, the scenes and scenery of the Holy Land by an author who was for twenty-five years a missionary in Syria and Palestine.

He says of his work that "a large part of it was actually written in the open country—on seashore, or sacred lake, on hillside or mountain top, under the olive or the oak, or the shadow of a great rock. The blessed book, at once his guide, pattern and text wears the same air of country life and He who came from heaven for man's redemption, loved not the city."

"The pictorial illustrations of the books have been prepared with much care and great skill, not only to the interest, but to the real value of the work. The maps have been compiled and drawn with reference to what they exemplify. Each volume is supplied with two copious and carefully prepared indexes, one of texts and the other of names and subjects, greatly facilitating reference to those parts of the work where the various subjects treated are to be found."

The book begins at Beirut, the topography and history of which is given, together with its legends and its comparatively recent rapid growth. The period of the book is the middle nineteenth century. It is interesting to note that Beirut is believed to have been the spot where the patron of England, St. George, killed the dragon, and the deep bay which washes its shore is called by the saint's name.

Ancient cities within easy traveling distance of Beirut: Acre, with its beautiful plain and landscape, and Caesarea, with its oak glades, memorable for the scene of the transfiguration near it, the Huleh, the plain and marsh of which formed the battleground of Abraham, embellish pages which are otherwise occupied by accounts of the temples, ruins, ruling families, aqueducts and sarcophagi which render Palestine one of the most interesting countries in the world for the traveler and the writer alike.

The country is portrayed intimately through its Orientalism in matters of betrothal and wedlock, through its superstitions, its flora and its fauna its rivers and its monuments. The lovely tomb of Lady Hester Stanhope of England, the ruins of Mount Lebanon, recalls in the mind of the author some curious coincidences between her burial and that of her early love, Sir John Moore. In silence, he writes, on the lone mountain at midnight, with lanterns dimly burning, we left her alone. There was but one of her own nation present, and his name was Moore.

Volume second is as full of interest and as fully illustrated as volume first. In tracing the history of Jerusalem, Mr. Thomson says, "The Franks kept possession of it less than 100 years, for it was given up to Saladin in 1187, and from that day to this it has remained in the hands of the Mohammedans. Jerusalem had existed 2,177 years when overthrown by Titus. Its whole age is now about 2,841 years."

In estimating this statement the reader must take into account that it speaks of Jerusalem in the year 1357 and not at the present time. The time and space devoted to give the first impressions of the city, describe the church of Mary and Gethsemane, the church of the birthplace of John the Baptist, the Holy Sepulchre and Calvary.

Mr. Thomson, in quoting Josephus' rapid sketch of the history of Jerusalem, quotes also the following words which the sad story of Josephus closes: "Yet hath not its great antiquity, nor its vast riches, nor the diffusion of its nation over all the habitable earth, nor the greatness of the veneration paid to it on a religious account, been sufficient to preserve it from being destroyed."

"Parting Friends."

By W. D. Howells, Harper and Brothers, of New York. 50 cents.

This little book is classified as a farce. If a brimming over of the most entertaining humor, and the most absolute insight into the vagaries and sentimentalities of the high-class American life when it is about to set out upon a journey, can be considered as farcical as they really are and appear to be, in the estimation of those who witness the parting between friends, one of whom is both friend and sweetheart.

Imagine a girl who has just engaged herself to a man who found out the mind when her departure for Europe the next day had been announced. Imagine the girl and her fiancé tucked away in an embrace of the steamer's music-room, hoping to have the parting minutes to themselves, and perpetually interrupted by the friendly inquisitors of those who come in, at critical moments, to bring baskets of grape-fruit, boxes of candy and flowers, and remain to chat and complete the discomfiture of the poor lovers.

The absurd climax is reached at the last moment and must have been evolved from the consciousness of the author, so absolutely does it impress itself upon the reader's mind as a thing that possibly and probably happened in real life, that might happen any day and every day.

"The House of the Seven Gables."

By Nina Larry Duryea. Illustrated by Hermann Meyer. D. Appleton & Company, of New York and London. $1.25 net.

The house in which the Gableys passed some happy months was the Chateau de Pelouse, built by Louis XIV. of France, and loaned by the Countess of Eyelau to Margaret Chandler, an American artist, commissioned by the State of Wisconsin to decorate the dome of its new public library, and in France to carry on her work.

While Margaret was in Paris making preparations to depart to the chateau, she was joined by an American friend, a widow, young, rich and beautiful, with a charming little son, named Alwyn. The widow herself is only known in the book as the "Lady." She has a blonde cousin, Lillian, from Bridgeport, Mass., and a French maid, Henriette. All these she desires to transport to Margaret's chateau and lead there the simple life.

Finally Margaret consents. She and her four friends make five. Her cook and chambermaid, Marie and the garde, complete the tale of "The Seven Gables."

The story of the simple life they led is delightfully and quaintly told, with just enough diablerie in it to render it altogether fetching.

The Mayor and the Mayor's wife are diverting characters, and the romance of the book is quite sufficiently brought into play by the advent upon the scene of Lord Ashburne, a titian and talented Englishman, and Prince of Italy. The Mayor's love-making favors it is true is delicately and daintily injected, but it is very real, and adds much to the zest of the story.

The book is just the color and trend to render it most acceptable to the summer reader.

"The Eyes at the Window."

By Olivia Smith Cornelius. The Broadway Publishing Company, of New York. $1.50.

The window through which the "Eyes" looked was the window of a cottage at Sandy Lake, a summer cottage with a houseful of girl hostesses and men guests, chaperoned by the maiden lady of uncertain age, known as "Aunt Susan."

The mystery element begins at the beginning, with the arrival from the city at the cottage of the Hon. William Simpson, attorney-at-law, unconscious from a blow on the head and unable to give any account of his missing horse and vehicle, or of his friend Smith, who had accompanied him from the city.

Smith continued to disappear as absolutely and completely as if the earth had opened to swallow him up, all efforts to find him continuing to prove unavailing. The horse and buggy are eventually located, without affording the least clue to the fate of Smith.

In the meantime adventures of the most terrifying and exciting nature keep the girls and men at the summer cottage in a state of high tension.

Papers and jewels mysteriously disappear, uncanny noises disturb the peaceful atmosphere of night, and dreadful staring eyes look in at the window.

There is such a succession of adventures and such a doze—g of mystery that it hardly seems such happenings can be explained away by any process of cold reason.

The unraveling doesn't come about until the very last minute, not until there has been any number of breathless thrills leading up to the solution of the mystery.

A case of mistaken identity throughout adds to the number and depth of complications. There are several pairs of lovers to be made happy, along with the clearing up of apparently incomprehensible puzzles, and a satisfactory achievement of the whole keeps the reader so busily engaged and so interested, that the end brings with it a feeling of regret that the book does not measure double its length in adventure.

The author of the book is Southern by virtue of her family connections, and has turned to literature from pure love of it.

"Stanton Wins."

By Eleanor M. Ingram. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. of Indianapolis. $1.00 net.

A new novel by the author of "The Game and the Candle." A story of the racing hunt, hum of the auto that is filling the ear with its music and awakening the instinct, which always stirs in the mind of the reader or the onlooker when the element of chance enters largely into the game played.

Stanton is the name of the main player. And beside him, quick, alert and indispensable, sits the slender, trim figure of his mechanic, without whose help the game could not be won or kept.

The mechanic claims to have a double in the person of his sister, Jessica. It is this double personality which invests the story with an elusive element that is irresistibly attractive.

Eleanor Carlisle is a woman who causes the mischief and mischief which throws Stanton out of winning his race, in more instances than one. She is the real factor who brings about the tragedy that nearly causes Stanton's death and reveals the secret of the mechanic's double.

But only happiness comes out of it all for every one except Miss Carlisle. The novel is one of the most spirited and charming books of its kind which this season has produced.

"George Thorne."

By Norval Richardson. L. C. Page Co., of Boston, through the Bell Book and Stationery Co., of Richmond. $1.50.

This is a novel of American life of the present time. The hero of it, a Western man, takes advantage of a conversation between two men, who men which he overhears, to introduce himself to a wealthy New York family as its long-lost son, kidnapped in infancy, never restored, and leaving a place that was unfilled as the years passed.

George Thorne, for this is the name of the young Westerner, is most successful in being received as what he represents himself to be—a son stolen as a child, the victim afterward of a difficult environment in the far West. He is in truth warred to the breaking point over a hand-to-hand conflict with a fortune that has dealt him no favors, that has rendered even the bare living that his work has won a thing difficult of attainment.

In the family where he is adopted as a favored member he first learns what it means to enjoy life. He learns upon his course of deceit systematically and with regard to the advantages that he will gain, the position to which he may aspire.

At first his success intoxicates him. Then, because the woman who has mourned through years for her lost son, takes him so entirely to her heart, with such unquestioning love and faith, and because a younger woman, her niece, refuses to look upon the Westerner as a rival for herself, because she suspects the truth of him, the young man's conscience is awakened. He feels that he cannot longer deceive the only incarnation of motherhood he has ever known, and that he must justify his manhood in the eyes of the other woman he wishes to make his wife.

Just what he did do and just what came of it will be found out by the reader of the book. That events shape themselves unexpectedly is due to the cleverness of an author who provides a surprise for all who have looked forward to a conventional sort of ending to an uncommon romance.

"The Aeroplane, Past, Present and Future."

By Claude Grahame-White and Harry Harper. J. B. Lippincott Co., of Philadelphia and London. $3.50 net.

Claude Grahame-White was the winner of the Gordon-Bennett International Aviation Cup in 1910, and his work, and that of Harry Harper, embellished with ninety-three illustrations, will doubtless be considered a standard reference on what has been attempted and achieved in aviation.

The policy of the book, as announced by its joint authors, is to give information likely to be useful and interesting, and to induce experts to write sections upon subjects, regarding which, they are the best authorities.

Following out this plan, C. C. Greenhold is the author of sections devoted to the pioneers of flight, early flights among others described, being those of Captain Ferber, Santos Dumont, Wilbur Wright and Henry Farman.

C. C. Greenhold, an amateur, in telling how aeroplane accidents may be prevented, deals, says the book, with the subject that he has studied very carefully, the constructional features of an aeroplane which spell either peril or safety to an airman when he is involved in a fall. His writings have been usually located, without affording the least clue to the fate of Smith.

In the meantime adventures of the most terrifying and exciting nature keep the girls and men at the summer cottage in a state of high tension.
